I have a Pega service on a legacy mainframe. I'm considering moving it to a Linux/Cyrus box. It uses the Pega771_engine.iso7. Would you recommend my moving it to a full 771? I'm not worried about the 993 functionality yet. I'm interested in the server capabilities. Should I make it a full 771? I have not found any info out there about what would be an appropriate level. A variety of techniques will be investigated to determine their effectiveness in reducing the environmental impact of waste. The materials will be fabricated by two process routes: (i) hot forming and annealing, and (ii) cold forging. The formed stainless steel will be characterized in terms of corrosion resistance, microstructure, and other properties. The annealing processes will also be examined in order to understand how treatment variables affect the solidification and reheating processes. The thermodynamics of the formation of austenite by rapid solidification will be studied and the microstructure of the phase with respect to the crystallographic texture formed will be examined. The mechanical properties, including tensile, yield, and fatigue behavior, will be characterized in terms of material composition, alloying elements, grain size, and texture. A melt is constructed which nucleates at the melt surface in a manner that produces fine-grained austenite platelets with a random (or weak) texture. The mechanical properties of the material will be determined. The material will be compacted at high temperature and under load. The stress-strain responses of this deformation will be compared to results of material tests. Since a melt is used in this investigation, the flow response of the material will be examined in order to understand the influence of density, grain size, and texture on the strain-rate sensitivity of the material and hence on its plasticity. A melt with desired nucleation
